

Richard Wright Center (RWC)

Your Resource for Writing in Graduate School

Our mission is to provide an environment for intellectual engagement outside the classroom.

Why Use the RWC

As a graduate student, you are preparing to enter professional and scholarly conversations on issues that matter in your field. Participating in these conversations involves writing and getting feedback from your peers, colleagues, and professors. The Richard Wright Center (RWC) offers you the opportunity to receive feedback from trained writing consultants at any stage of the creative and research processes as you develop written, oral, and visual representations of your ideas for academic audiences across the globe.

How You Can Use the RWC

- Request a one-to-one consultation to receive feedback on your writing, speaking, or research project, such as
 - research papers
 - article critiques
 - thesis or dissertation proposals
 - articles for publication
 - conference presentations
 - visual aids (e.g., posters, PowerPoint slides)
 - thesis or dissertation defense.
- Attend workshops to learn more about writing at the graduate level.
- Refer to resources on writing in graduate school available on our website.
- Invite us to your class or study group to talk about any issue related to research and writing.
